BYRAN'S WELCOME.

In all the history of this country no private citizen has ever had such an ovation as the one given Mr. Bryan on his return from a trip around the world. Some heroes of war and a few special guests, such as Lafayette, have had national triumphs, but no plain man of the people, holding no office, possessing no great wealth and welcomed solely as a man, has ever been distinguished by such rare honors.

When it is remembered that Mr. Bryan left the western shores of the United States less than a year ago with scarcely any notice of his going and with no public farewell; when one recalls the fact that his political record is marked chiefly by his great defeats; and remembering that his last great political stand—in the St. Louis convention—was in behalf of a cause which he lost, this demonstration in New York takes its place as the most unique public tribute ever paid any American.

To the thoughtful student of history the event suggests a most interesting parallel between Lincoln's early political career and Bryan's. Lincoln took advanced ground on the slavery question when his friends advised him it would mean his defeat. He was beaten in his race with Douglas, but with his famous dictum that no nation could be half slave and half free, he fixed the issue of the day, foreshadowed the ultimate triumph of his cause and paved the way for his own election to the presidency. When he made his famous declaration, the politicians of his day thought he had written his own political farewell, but from the obscurity of a country law office he rose to the presidential chair because he was brave enough and big enough to utter the truth as he saw it.

When Bryan took his stand against the trusts and the abuses of piratical corporations, the politicians of his own party thought he had blundered and a good many of them deserted him. Refusing to change his position, persisting in his attacks on unlawful organizations and public dishonesty generally, he went down to apparent defeat and seemed to be doomed to disappointment and permanent retirement from party leadership. But history is repeating itself and Bryan returning from his absence of a year finds his beliefs and charges verified by events. The insurance revelations, the story of corrupt campaign contributions by corporations, the whole trend of public affairs since his departure has justified his every utterance, and, like Lincoln, he finds his countrymen making his issues, theirs. Big enough and brave enough to stand by his convictions, Mr. Bryan's views have been crystallized in the universal demand for restraint of criminal corporations, the destruction of monopolies and reforms in the use of the taxing power which has been usurped as a means of perpetuating great economic wrongs.

A striking evidence of the change of public sentiment is to be found in the very organization which started the plans for the great reception to the Nebraskan. In his political campaigns, Mr. Bryan found the commercial travelers largely against him, particularly in 1896. They believed the Democratic policy would mean disaster to them and their interests if it were put into effect. They worked for Republican triumph and got it. In the intervening years they have seen their numbers dwindle and their means of livelihood cut off by combination after combination. They finally organized an anti-trust league, and the Nebraskan was the man they turned to as the fitting spokesman and friend of their cause. In nearly every branch of industry the revulsion of feeling has been similar. Labor, which shouted for the "full dinner-pail" and the Republican candidate, sees monopoly entrenched behind Republican legislation and its own demands for recognition refused by Republican administration. Naturally it turns to Bryan.

The great commercial interests which ask no special privileges once regarded the Democratic leader with suspicion as too radical; now they hail him as a model of sane progressiveness, the foe of corruption, the conservator of every honest man's rights. In the whole range of American political forces, the men find friends where once he had only opponents, and the New York reception is but an epitome of the high regard, the enthusiastic confidence which the people feel for the man.

It is true, as his enemies point out, that big crowds and noise and enthusiasm do not necessarily signify much politically. There is a danger in too much rejoicing in advance of the battle, and the American people have been known to repudiate the heroes they had hailed but a short time before. In Mr. Bryan's case, however, we believe the outward signs of confidence and support are founded on a sincere belief in the man, a conviction that he is worthy to be the head of the nation. Unless some untoward event, some miraculous obstacle intervenes, the great commoner will be nominated and elected as president of the United States.

Those "Americans" who swore they had been credited with money they did not earn belong in the didn't-know-it-was-loaded class.

For a party that was supposed to be extinct, the Democracy has managed to keep little old New York pretty busy this week.

SOCIETY

Miss Julia Cullen entertained yesterday at a luncheon for Miss Edith Sutherland, who will leave shortly to re-enter school. The affair was an Indian luncheon, and all the decorations were on that order. Large Indian baskets were used to hold the floral decorations which were cat-tails and sunflowers. Indian heads done in water colors were used as place cards, and after the luncheon a game of archery was played with Indian bows and arrows, which were kept as souvenirs. In this game Miss Jessie Home won the prize, an Indian basket, and another, the guest prize, went to Miss Sutherland. The other guests were Miss Beth Critchlow, Miss Jean Odell, Miss Edna Farnsworth, Miss Eudora Daly, Miss Evelyn Kelly, Miss Ida Legg, Miss Hollister Hancock, Miss Josephine Devereaux, Miss Margaret Ryan, Miss Agnes Ryan, Miss Susan Sawyer, Miss Stella Fabian, Miss Stella Cohn, Miss Elizabeth Weltz, Miss Helen Evans, Miss Florence Sears, Mrs. Charles W. Lawrence and Mrs. Fred U. Leonard.

COUNTING THE COST.

In his address to the American Bar association at St. Paul, George R. Peck, the president, struck a note of deep interest when he suggested that the constantly increasing tendency toward a multiplicity of laws is limiting the activity and development of the individual, the unit of society. In his view the complexity of modern civilization and of our national life inevitably calls for an increase in the number of laws, but he deplores the number of enactments which are purely administrative, defining what may and what may not be done in business and other affairs formerly supposed to be the domain of individual action.

Mr. Peck, in his limited time, could not discuss the whole of his subject, but he touched upon one of the vital questions of this generation. There is no doubt but that the consolidation of business enterprises, the centralization of great industries in a few hands, the predatory competition which meets the newcomer in almost every line of business, is stifling the individual initiative and limiting the younger generation to employment as wage-earners rather than as proprietors. Looking over the field of business, one sees very little opportunity as compared with the field of, say, twenty years ago. Where there were small stores, the larger ones only are paying; where there were small manufacturers furnishing the individual independence as well as a living, the great machines of corporate creation control production. The small bakery, the small shoe shop, the hundred and one small establishments in various lines have all given way to the big corporations with practically unlimited capital.

It may be true, as their friends urge, that these big establishments effect an economy impossible under the old system, but the consumer finds no advantage in an economic saving which inures only to monopoly and gives him no share in the saving. The community at large may gain, though the cash gain is doubtful; and even if there is a net saving in dollars and cents, is it worth while? Does not dependence upon great corporations and the limitation of individual opportunity injure the whole community? Isn't the cost in manhood degraded too big a price to pay for an economic gain?

It is one of the hopeful signs of the times that men are beginning to ask about these things, are figuring the cost of restricted opportunity, and are wondering whether the commercial ascendancy of the nation has not been bought at fearful sacrifice of individual liberty.

The announcement that a finance committee is going to get funds for the "American" party does not necessarily mean that the party's old bills are to be paid. No true "patriot" would think of settling his debts when the money is needed so badly for campaign purposes.

An esteemed and more or less veracious contemporary says the "American" party is the only party with any real principles. To which A. J. Davis, T. R. Black, Martin Mulvey and P. J. Moran say amen. They fail, however, to say what the "real principles" are.

That board of public works is getting reckless these days; it gave Pat Moran orders Wednesday. The orders may or may not be executed as the mood strikes Patrick.

The president says he has no intention of interfering in the New York state campaign, but he'll knock the block off the man who presumes to oppose his friends in the state.

Those Cubans have inaugurated the most deadly typewriter campaign known to history, barring possibly the controversy between B. Nelson and one Gans.

Employees of the city who are under orders to dig up ten per cent of their salaries are probably wondering why the "American" party denounces the titling system so violently.

We hate to think of what will happen to those prize fighters in Goldfield of one of them does not get mortally hurt in their battle.

Mr. Hearst says he has nothing against Mr. Bryan. Possibly that is why Mr. Hearst has nothing good to say about the Nebraskan.

Those "Americans" who swore they had been credited with money they did not earn belong in the didn't-know-it-was-loaded class.

TRIB

"Big Lew" Foster, owner of many race horses and known all over the Pacific coast, writes on July 10, 1902, and verifies the first letter on February 2, 1906. Read them:

"I was a slave to whisky and cigarettes for 11 years. I commenced in June taking 'TRIB.' When I commenced I weighed 276 pounds, and was almost helpless. 'TRIB' has surely cured me of both habits."

February 2, 1906, Mr. Foster writes again: "Here it is. This is only one of the many letters we have—voluntarily sent to us: 'Please find draft for $100. Send me one dozen treatments of 'TRIB.' I took 'TRIB' myself and never felt better in my life than I do now. I have gone down in weight to 195 pounds, and never think of using either liquor or tobacco any more. I know of 25 cures. You can get references from most of them if you care to write. I enclose name. Sincerely yours."
